Dashain: The Festival of Victory

Dashain, also known as Vijaya Dashami, is one of the most important festivals in Nepal. Celebrated in autumn, it spans over 15 days and commemorates the victory of good over evil. Families come together to worship the goddess Durga, exchange blessings, and indulge in festive feasts. The highlight of Dashain is the flying of kites and the swinging on intricately decorated bamboo swings known as "ping."

Tihar: The Festival of Lights

Tihar, also known as Deepawali or the Festival of Lights, is a five-day celebration that follows Dashain. Each day of Tihar is dedicated to different forms of reverence, including worshiping crows, dogs, cows, and the goddess of wealth, Laxmi. Houses are adorned with colorful lights, and intricate designs called "rangoli" are created on the doorsteps. The festival culminates with Bhai Tika, where brothers receive special blessings from their sisters.

Holi: The Festival of Colors

Holi, the vibrant Hindu festival known for its exuberant colors, is celebrated with great enthusiasm in Nepal. People joyfully throw colored powders and water at each other, symbolizing the arrival of spring and the triumph of good over evil. The festival is a time of merriment, music, and dance, where communities come together to celebrate and forge new bonds of friendship.

Teej: The Festival of Women

Teej is a festival dedicated to the goddess Parvati and celebrated predominantly by women. Married women fast for the well-being and longevity of their husbands, while unmarried women pray for a good spouse. The festival is marked by singing, dancing, and women dressing in vibrant red attire. It is a time for women to come together, enjoy festivities, and strengthen their bonds.
